

and shed his coat as a peroration to flings at his political adversaries on the Republican and Democratic tickets.

The loudest burst of applause greeted Senator Wheeler's prediction of election for Senator La Follette, his presidential candidate, though there were stirrs at his repeated jabbing at President Coolidge and the Republican administration.

Again and again he criticized President Coolidge, whom he termed the "mythically strong, courageous, silent, watchful man who occupies the presidential chair," and attacked satirically Charles G. Dawes, the Republican vice-presidential nominee, for "his gallant service in war on organized labor," while he referred to John W. Davis, Democratic standard bearer, as "a man who would be willing, it seems, to out-Coolidge Coolidge as a sergeant of Wall Street."

Declaring that the Republican and Democratic parties have long since ceased to "represent distinct lines of economic thought and interest," the candidate continued:

"They have fallen under control of a single power which uses them to further its own interests. Instead of a government of the people, by the people, for the people, we have a government of Wall Street, by Wall Street, for Wall Street. I use the term Wall Street to designate the industrial and commercial interests centering in that crooked line in lower New York city.
